Youth behind town hall disappointed by city's snub

May Warren
Metro | Toronto

Young people who organized a town hall meeting on gun violence are frustrated no one from city council bothered to show up and hear their concerns.

It's added to the general "disenfranchisement of young people not feeling like our voice is being heard," said Kevin Vuong, co-chair of the Toronto Youth Equity Strategy.

And, more importantly, he said, the voices aren't "being listened to."

Vuong's group, along with the Toronto Youth Cabinet, organized Monday's event which generated discussion about everything from the need for jobs to the lack of current mental health supports for youth — and sent invitations to all councillors and the mayor last month.

A representative from Mayor John Tory's office did attend but left early.

Keerthana Kamalavasan, a spokeswoman for Tory's office, said the mayor is in northern Ontario visiting indigenous communities.

"The mayor is committed to engaging young people so they feel safe and have a sense of responsibility for their community," she wrote in an email to Metro.

Tory looks forward to speaking with youth at a series of public meetings being held across Toronto in the next few months, she added.

Entrepreneurs ease Zika fears of Rio Olympians

MOSQUITOS

Biodegradable traps given to national team to use in Brazil

Gilbert Ngabo
Metro | Toronto

A team of Toronto entrepreneurs is doing its part to ease Zika virus concerns among Olympians headed to Rio.

About 250 biodegradable mosquito traps made by upstart Greenlid have been donated to the Canadian Olympic Committee and will be placed around areas where the athletes are living and training while in Brazil.

The partnership comes as Olympic athletes continue to pull out of the competition for fear of the virus. Last week, Canadian tennis icon Milos Raonic cited uncertainty about Zika as was one of the reasons he decided not to compete. Two staff members from the organizing committee also aren't making the trip.

Jackson Wyatt, co-founder of Greenlid, said the goal is to create a "mosquito shield on the perimeter of where our athletes will be."

"It's about taking extra precaution, any extra step against these mosquitoes," he said.

> We just drop the trap off, just fill it with water and insecticide and just kind of forget it. Morgan Wyatt

Wyatt and his brother, Morgan, started producing the paper-based traps about two years ago, out of their passion to eliminate plastics in the fight against mosquitoes.

Since then, they've shipped thousands of traps to Australia where the government uses them to fight off dengue fever. About 10 other countries are running similar trials, including Brazil, Ecuador, Nigeria, Pakistan and Indonesia.

Each biodegradable trap costs about $1, which is almost five times cheaper than traditional plastic traps or mosquito nets, Wyatt said.

For every trap purchased, Greenlid donates another one to charities working in communities most affected by mosquito-borne illnesses.

For the two brothers, the beauty lies in simplicity.

"We just drop the trap off, just fill it with water and insecticide and just kind of forget it," said Wyatt. "No education burden or literacy needed. It's just the simplest of things."

THE DETAILS

- Greenlid traps are filled with water and sprayed with insecticide, which attracts and kills mosquitoes around the clock.
- Traps last about six weeks and decompose on their own.

Tenor leaves Ontario tour after anthem incident

The Tenors member who altered the lyrics to O Canada prior to the Major League Baseball all-star game is backing out of at least two upcoming concerts in Ontario.

Remigio Pereira recently apologized after making headlines for changing the verse "With glowing hearts we see thee rise, the True North strong and free," to "We're all brothers and sisters, all lives matter to the great."

He also held up a sign bearing the message "all lives matter" on one side and "united we stand" on the other, while standing alongside his fellow Tenors on the field.

In the aftermath of the incident, the Aeolian in London, Ont., cancelled a concert featuring Pereira and Toronto artist Pavlo slated for Sept. 28.

Aeolian production and marketing co-ordinator Michael Del Vecchio says the concert has been reinstated now that Pereira is no longer involved with the tour.

Pereira was also to perform with Pavlo at the FirstOntario Performing Arts Centre in St. Catharines, Ont., on Oct. 6. But the venue issued a statement saying that the tour would continue as "Pavlo & Guests" and would no longer feature Pereira, citing Pavlo's representatives.

"The man has sincerely apologized. Let's move on!" said Pavlo on his verified Facebook account. "Those of us that know him personally can assure you that he did not have any malicious intent. The last thing he wanted to do was disrupt the thousands of people that made arrangements to attend the concerts. Looking forward to seeing everyone at the shows."

HANLAN'S POINT

Friends put off by men in the buff

Two friends who hit the beach at Hanlan's Point last weekend found themselves telling men in the buff to back off.

At first, Cailey Root, 29, and Gordon Veldhoen, 32, thought the two nude men who approached them were just being cheeky, asking them to take their clothes off on the boardwalk.

Hanlan's Point has hosted thousands of exposed beach bums since it was officially designated as "clothing optional" in 2002. Still, taking one's clothes off isn't required to go on the beach.

Often, naturists will approach clothed people on the beach and encourage them to strip down, but rarely are they forceful about it, said Veldhoen, who goes to the beach nearly every weekend.

"I think it was a little bit worse, too, because Cailey had never been there before … so her introduction to the beach was these guys harassing her," he said.

As the friends entered the boardwalk and took off their shoes, two men — whom they described as nude, tanned and in their 60s — butted in.

"They were like, 'OK, well that's a start. But you need to take the rest of your clothes off,'" Root said. "I had never been there before and if I wasn't with my friend, I would have just gone home because it felt super unwelcoming and really unsettling."

The friends ignored the comments and went to the beach. They also spotted laminated signs on nearby poles, telling people to undress.

One sign read: "UNDRESS STATION. BEYOND this place, YOU should be NUDE. For the COMFORT OF THE NUDISTS AND to show respect for the nudists." Below, the word "CLOTHES" was circled in red with a slash running through it.

Once the city got the skinny on the unauthorized signs, the placards were removed, said Matt Cutler, a spokesman for the city's parks, forestry and recreation department.

Cutler said the illegal signs are being looked into and he doesn't know whether the city will pursue "legal enforcement." Anyone who violates the sign bylaw is liable to a fine between $500 and $100,000. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

TRANSIT

First required step taken to file damages claim

Metrolinx is threatening legal action against Bombardier over production delays that the agency fears could derail the opening of two Toronto transit projects.

According to a source with knowledge of discussions between the two parties, Metrolinx issued a notice of default to Bombardier last week that claims the Quebec-based rail manufacturer is in breach of contract in its deal to supply the provincial organization with up to 182 light rail vehicles (LRVs).

The notice is a possible precursor to filing a claim for damages against Bombardier, which has yet to deliver a single LRV.

Metrolinx placed the $770-million order in 2010 for vehicles to serve LRT lines that include Toronto's Eglinton Crosstown, Finch Avenue West, and Sheppard Avenue East projects.

The first two lines are scheduled for completion by 2021. Metrolinx will require 76 LRVs for the $5.3-billion Crosstown and 23 LRVs for the $1.2-billion Finch project. The Sheppard LRT has been deferred indefinitely.

Bombardier was supposed to deliver the first pilot vehicle for testing in the spring of 2014. Metrolinx says while that date was later revised to the spring of 2015, the agency is still waiting.

Bombardier was also to have supplied 73 low-floor streetcars to the commission by the end of 2015, but has only delivered 22.

The TTC is pursuing a claim for damages on that issue worth $50 million. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

INFRASTRUCTURE

Taking transit will cost us $50 billion

Borrowing for new transit lines in Ontario will boost the province's net debt an extra $50 billion to a whopping $350 billion by 2021.

Those numbers were released Tuesday in a new report by Ontario's independent Financial Accountability Office (FAO), which warned the province faces the risk of higher interest rates because of the debt load.

"Ontario's interest payments on new debt could increase if lenders view Ontario as a more risky borrower, even in the absence of changes in market interest rates," said the 13-page report by financial analysts Diarra Sourang and Peter Harrison.

Finance Minister Charles Sousa defended the 12-year program, which will spend $160 billion on new and improved transit and other infrastructure, including the new Eglinton Crosstown line and light rail transit on Hurontario in Mississauga.

"We know that investing in infrastructure spurs economic growth and increases GDP which is why we've decided to make a historic $160-billion investment in roads, bridges, schools and hospitals across Ontario," Sousa said in a statement.

$160B

Estimated cost of infrastructure projects, including transit, schools and hospitals, over the next 12 years.

Ontario is taking advantage of record-low interest rates to make the infrastructure investments, added Sousa, noting long-term borrowing is forecast to be at its lowest levels since the deep recession of 2008.

He said the province remains on track to eliminate its deficit by 2018, although the FAO has cautioned that deficits could soon return because of spending pressures on the government. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Pilot to offer free Wi-Fi in Parkdale

INTERNET

Cost of service creating unfair barrier, argues reBOOT Canada

May Warren
Metro | Toronto

A pair of local organizations won't be mad if you steal some of their Internet.

ReBOOT Canada has started a one-year pilot project to provide free Wi-Fi access in Parkdale, from Sorauren Avenue to Dufferin Street.

"It will give you the opportunity to connect 24/7, not just when the library's open," said Frank Rota, executive director of reBOOT.

Rota sees Internet access as a utility that should be available to everyone, not just those who can afford pricey data plans.

"If you're creating a barrier where only people who can afford luxuries can afford to access that convenience, you're creating a discrepancy that needs to be addressed. It's not fair," he said.

> Without data you're up a creek.
> Raveen Gopaul

Parkdale Activity and Recreation Centre and Parkdale Community Legal Services will host the actual Wi-Fi hot spots, with a small grant from reBOOT to cover monthly costs.

The recreation centre's hot spot is already up and running, and the second location should launch by the end of the month.

Raveen Gopaul, the centre's manager of technology, said people who use their services will benefit, as they often can't afford data plans or even the price of coffee at Starbucks or other cafés offering Wi-Fi.

While cities such as New York and London, Ont. have experimented with free Wi-Fi programs, it's something Toronto has never been able to get off the ground.

If the program can continue past its one-year pilot, Gopaul is hopeful the idea of community agencies partnering with non-profits to provide Wi-Fi might catch on.

"The city can't seem to get their act together to provide public access to the Internet. They've tried over the years and they couldn't do it, so if we can do it, let's model it," he said.

COMMERCIAL REAL ESTATE

Downtown Toronto boasts lowest office vacancy rate

Downtown Toronto has the lowest office vacancy rate in North America, dropping to 4.9 per cent in the second quarter of the year from 5.3 per cent in the first, according to a report by commercial real-estate firm CBRE.

The continuation of a three-year decline in vacancies means Toronto is outperforming markets such as Midtown Manhattan and San Francisco, traditionally the most solid in the U.S., said Paul Morassutti, executive managing director, on Tuesday.

The downtown Toronto vacancy rate was 6.5 per cent in the first quarter of 2014.

The drop is "really a combination of reasonably good economic growth in Toronto, good demand and discipline in the market," he said. "While we are adding new buildings and new supply, we're certainly not doing it willy-nilly."

Despite a building boom that has added about 4.4. million square feet of office space to the core in the last three years, the new and the older spaces are being absorbed, said Morassutti.

Longtime downtown companies are moving to the new buildings, opening up space in older towers in the financial district.

Downtown locations help attract millennial workers, who want to be close to their homes in the condos that surround the financial district. But it has come at the expense of suburban office space. The question becomes how that will play out as millennials get married and have children, he said. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

HOMELESSNESS

Reshaping women's lives through pottery

A pottery studio helped save Judith Tomlinson's life.

Eight years ago, Tomlinson was homeless and struggling to support herself while living with a disability and past trauma — and then she found Inspirations Studio.

"I've never been homeless again," Tomlinson said at the studio recently, just after finishing a custom-ordered clay teapot.

Tucked away on the ground floor of a worn brick building on Dundas Street W. just north of Bloor Street W., Inspirations Studio is run by the women's aid organization Sistering and has a unique approach when it comes to changing the lives of marginalized women. Teaching them how to make pottery and sell it does more than give the women a new skill and source of income; it also gives them a chance to heal.

"We see people's confidence grow, we see their ability to work with others increase, we see them have a lot of pride in the work they're doing," said Sistering social enterprise manager Theresa Morin.

The women at Inspirations have all experienced homelessness, and many also face mental-health issues or addictions that make it difficult to maintain employment, Morin said.

Judith Tomlinson
TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Christine Watch, an Inspirations member since January, said the studio is "already changing my life — like, big-time."

Watch, who said she'd been through some "pretty bad times" in the past few years, comes to Inspirations three days a week and wants to be there for even more.

"It's hard to say how great it is," she said while spinning a mug on a pottery wheel. "It's kind of like a metaphor — you're making the clay as you're making yourself." TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

eSports bar satiates appetite for local competitive gaming

Colin McNeil
Metro | Canada

Finally, Toronto's night life has got some game.

Good Game, that is: the city's first and so far only eSports bar.

Located at 2097 Yonge St., just south of Eglinton, the joystick gin mill has a simple formula: Combine a rapidly growing fan appetite for competitive gaming, a social atmosphere, and local libations.

Good Game owner Pavel Kabargine wants his bar to be accessible to anyone who enjoys playing video games. LIZ BEDDALL/METRO

Call it control+alt+replete.

Good Game is like any traditional sports bar — TVs, barstools and booze. The difference? Whether the Blue Jays are top of the division or it's the UEFA Euro finals, "we're still going to be here showcasing eSports," said owner and director Pavel Kabargine in an interview with Metro.

Forget the Raptors, the Leafs or TFC; think Overwatch, League of Legends and StarCraft.

Behind the ornate wooden bar you'll find custom-made birch taps that pour only Canadian craft beer. The rotating cocktail menu is full of artisanal twists on old favourites, with names that are nods to video game hallmarks like "Leeeerooyyy Jenkins!" and "Khala's Embrace."

Upstairs you'll find a small bar, couches, TVs and PCs loaded with the current roster of popular eSports. "If you know you're a gamer, and you want to meet up with other gamers this is the place for you," said Kabargine.

But if Candy Crush is more your speed, don't sweat it.

"We've made the downstairs completely neutral — a cool environment where you'd like to be, and not necessarily for the video game aspect," Kabargine said.

"You could be absolutely anybody, come in from the street, stare at the screen, listen to the commentary and you're going to get it."

Pokéconomy free market goes online

TECHNOLOGY

Businesses looking to lure players with app's hot spots

Luke Simcoe
Metro | Toronto

Everyone from unexpected entrepreneurs to established businesses are cashing in on Toronto's burgeoning Pokéconomy.

Pokémon Go launched in Canada on Sunday, sending thousands of local players into the streets in search of so-called Pokéspots, areas where the digital creatures are more likely to be found — and caught.

Now, businesses near those spots are seeking to turn the influx of players into an influx of customers.

WaffleU, a waffle restaurant in nearby Vaughan, began offering discounts to Pokémon fans before the game was even officially available. However, owner Alex Puzo had to rescind the special after being flooded with players.

Gavin Canning, the social media manager for Dufflet Pastries on Queen West, began actively inviting Pokémon players into the café after learning it was located near three Pokéspots.

"I've caught 15 different Pokémon in the store," he said. "Why wouldn't you take advantage of something like that?"

Businesses can attract Pokémon players to their establishments using "lures," items that can be purchased in-game and used to attract Pokémon to a location. Lures can cost as little as 99 cents for 30 minutes.

In New York — where the game has been available for over a week — pizza parlours have reported sales spikes of 30 per cent since jumping on the Pokémon bandwagon, according to Bloomberg reports.

And it's not just stores.

Toronto's Craigslist board is bursting with people willing to chauffeur Pokémon players around town for as little as $20 an hour.

"I can drive you around the city in a clean, safe, and air-conditioned car while you catch Pokémon," one add reads.

Others are offering to walk — or hunt — around the city so players don't have to spend the time doing it themselves. Some are even peddling their skills as "master" Pokémon trainers with a little extra time on their hands.

Mother of 2-year-old boy who died upset memorial used as Pokéstop

In just a few weeks, Pokémon Go has become one of the most popular games in the world. But for Jenny Latimer, the app has brought only a reminder of devastating loss and pain.

Latimer, a former Burlington resident who now lives in Nanaimo, B.C., says she's heartbroken by the fact a memorial plaque for her nearly two-year-old son has been used as a "PokéStop" in the app.

Latimer's son Kevin died in 2004, just shy of his second birthday, after falling from a window in his father's third-storey home during a court-ordered visit.

"I had a whole bunch of messages in my Facebook and the first couple didn't bother me. It was when I saw the picture that it was actually the plaque on his memorial that it hit me and I started crying," she said. "It's very difficult to deal with that."

The memorial is located at St. Luke's Church in Burlington, where Pokémon Go players have been gathering in recent days to take advantage of the fact it's been designated in the game as a PokéStop.

Latimer said she has tried contacting Niantic, the app's developer, to have the memorial removed as a PokéStop location. She has filled out an online form on the company's website, but has not received a response.

SickKids Hospital also posted a tweet asking the public not to drop "lures," which are items that attract Pokémon to a specific location, on its premises. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Council skips town hall

COMMUNITY

Meeting on gun violence triggers hard memories

May Warren
Metro | Toronto

Kevin Vuong, co-chair of the Toronto Youth Equity Strategy, said the town hall was organized because young people don't feel like they're being heard in discussions around gun violence in the city. LIZ BEDDALL/METRO

Monah Water knows about the impact guns can have a community.

Water, 28, grew up in Scarborough and distinctly remembers the impact the 2012 Danzig block party shooting had on the neighbourhood.

People lost friends, she said, and continued to struggle with memories of the night due to a lack of mental health support programs for victims of violence.

"A lot of the times in these communities there are violent incidences that family members go through and it's passed down from generation to generation," Water said.

It's one of the issues she, and others, raised this week during a town hall organized by Toronto youth to talk about — and explore solutions to stopping — gun violence.

The meeting has sparked a dialogue about how closely city politicians are listening when young people voice their concerns.

No city councillors showed up Monday night, despite invites that went out almost a month ago. The mayor is out of town, and the representative who came from his office left early.

Organizers weren't looking for someone to give them answers, Water said. More so, they wanted to feel valued and supported.

"They didn't necessarily have to say anything, just be there to listen," Water said. "It's one thing to have people for the city kind of champion the issues that the youth would like to see happen. But, to hear from the youth directly, I feel it was a missed opportunity and so much more could have come from it."

Other issues raised included the roots of gun violence and the need for more jobs for vulnerable youth.

Louis March, founder of Zero Gun Violence Movement and one of the panellists, suggested the city create a policy to employ vulnerable youth on infrastructure projects. He called the optics of council's absence "terrible."

"Missing in action, every single one of them, from the mayor down," he said.

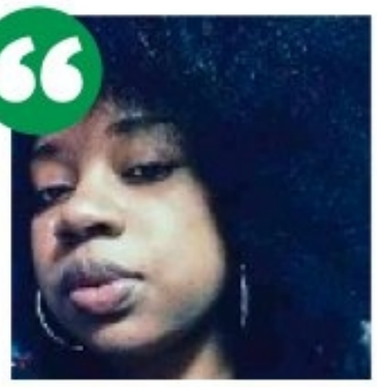
Mike Layton said many councillors, including himself, schedule vacation time after the July council meeting, which wrapped up on Friday.

But, he has volunteered to help town hall organizers schedule time to meet with other councillors.

"I know the good work that they do and we want to make sure that councillors benefit from the input that young people are providing around this incredibly important issue of violence that's taking place in our city," he told Metro on Tuesday.

Kevin Vuong, co-chair of the Toronto Youth Equity Strategy, said he hopes such a briefing will be possible.

"What we're looking at right now is: What we can do now that we have some of council's attention to ensure that they hear what was said last night, and that they will continue to have an open ear to young people."



> We need to look, as a city, at where the guns are coming from. Where they're being accessed, how they get on the streets and into the hands of young people. Monah Water

> We're in a divided city. It's a great city for some but not for all, and we're concerned about the fact that the city is not addressing the disparity and this division. Louis March

POLICE SHOOTINGS

No help for dead's families

Like most relatives of people killed by police, Heather Thompson doesn't meet government criteria for getting funding for legal representation at inquests.

"How is it reasonable to ask somebody who has already lost a human being to go into debt to come up with money to pay legal fees? That is downright unfair. I don't even think 'unfair' is the just word to use," she told the Star.

That funding normally goes only to parents or spouses of victims of crime, explains her lawyer, Peter Rosenthal.

Ontario's police watchdog, the Special Investigations Unit, declined to lay criminal charges in the Toronto police shooting death of Thompson's son, Ian Pryce.

Fortunately for Thompson, Rosenthal took on the three-week inquest pro bono, but he underscored the fact that's simply not a possibility in every case.

It's an idea gaining momentum, as at least three inquests probing police-involved deaths are set to take place in the GTA soon.

No criminal charges were laid in the deaths of Andrew Loku in Toronto or John Caleb Ross in Aurora. Toronto police Const. David Cavanagh was charged with second-degree murder in the death of Eric Osawe, but the charge was thrown out by a judge, who found there was no evidence the officer carelessly used his gun.

Ian Pryce, who had been living with paranoid schizophrenia, was shot dead in 2013 during a standoff with Toronto police's Emergency Task Force, after wielding what police later learned was a pellet gun.

His mother said she was "appalled" that she was expected to pay out of pocket for legal representation. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Wynne to talk legal pot in Whitehorse

ANNUAL CONFERENCE

Premier plans to ask for counterparts' thoughts

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne THE CANADIAN PRESS

As Canada's provincial and territorial leaders gather for their annual summer conference, Premier Kathleen Wynne wants the inside dope from her colleagues about legalized recreational marijuana.

"I can tell you I'm going to ask people what they're thinking about it," Wynne said.

Her comments come as Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's government prepares to end the prohibition of marijuana.

Trudeau has appointed former deputy prime minister Anne McLellan to lead a task force of medical and legal experts to consult with provinces, municipalities, and Canadians before releasing a report in November that will serve as the template of next year's legislation.

While marijuana is not on the meeting's formal agenda, Wynne said there will be "opportunities for us in casual conversation."

"I'll certainly be saying, 'How are you guys dealing with this? You know what I'm saying; what are you saying?'"

Here's where some of her fellow premiers stand on the subject of marijuana:

BRITISH COLUMBIA Premier Christy Clark has expressed concern on the effects of weed on children and teenagers.

"We need to make sure that young people whose brains are growing, will not be allowed unfettered access to getting marijuana," Clark told Global News in December. "Just like we have with alcohol … (if) it's something that government is prepared to endorse and allow, we should make sure that the rules are very clear that we don't want young people to be using it," she said.

NOVA SCOTIA Premier Stephen McNeil's government has a working group examining the issue, including whether weed should be sold at government-owned Nova Scotia Liquor Corporation stores.

"Canadians are asking for it, Canadians believe it's time to have marijuana legalized," McNeil said in April, noting "I'm sure there will be tax revenue, yes."

QUEBEC Premier Philippe Couillard's government, which owns the Société des alcools du Québec monopoly, has said it does not want marijuana sold on SAQ shelves.

Finance Minister Carlos Leitao said in February that they have "no plan, no idea, no intention of commercializing" cannabis.

MANITOBA Premier Brian Pallister said in April that legalization is "a concern for parents, it's a concern for all … that this be done properly."

SASKATCHEWAN Premier Brad Wall's government, meanwhile, has three of his cabinet ministers studying how legalized weed will affect road safety.

"I don't think we have clear answers on the potential effects on driver safety and what the plan is to prevent impaired driving due to marijuana use," Wall said in May.

"There are still too many accidents and deaths due to drunk drivers and all governments are taking steps to crack down on that. Legalizing marijuana could certainly mean more impaired drivers, which no one wants," he said. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Dramatic takedown on Winnipeg street

A woman in a mask points a gun to her head in Winnipeg on Tuesday. CONTRIBUTED

Winnipeg police say officers who tackled a masked teenager standing with a gun to her head in the middle of a major street Tuesday handled the volatile situation perfectly.

"As a deputy chief I must say that the restraint, the bravery, and the actions of those officers today is exemplary," said Deputy Chief Gord Perrier late Tuesday afternoon.

Around 9:50 a.m. local time, nine police units including a tactical support team descended on the historic intersection of Portage and Main, where a girl wearing a white kabuki-style mask stood with a gun pressed against her head.

Within the next four minutes, the girl removed the mask, attempted to walk away with the gun in her hand and was taken down by a tactical officer and arrested. METRO

PM to create youth council

Justin Trudeau is asking youths ages 16 to 24 to help shape the future of Canadian policy.

Trudeau unveiled his plans for Prime Minister's Youth Council on Twitter Tuesday in a live question-and-answer session.

"I'm looking forward to showing young people and showing all Canadians that young people's voices and input matter deeply," he said in a video posted on Twitter ahead of the Q&A session.

The non-partisan council, Trudeau's own initiative, will provide input on national issues such as employment, education and climate change. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

ATTEMPTED COUP

Tens of thousands lose jobs in Turkey

Asserting that "all the evidence" points to a U.S.-based Muslim cleric as the mastermind of last week's failed coup, Turkey's government on Tuesday fired tens of thousands of teachers, university deans and others accused of ties to the plot and demanded the cleric's extradition.

Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan raised the issue in a phone call with U.S. President Barack Obama, and his spokesman said the government was preparing a formal extradition request for the cleric, Fethullah Gulen. But he also suggested that the U.S. government shouldn't require the facts before extraditing him.

"A person of this kind can easily be extradited on grounds of suspicion," said the spokesman, Ibrahim Kalin. "And there is very strong suspicion for his involvement, for Gulen's involvement, in this coup attempt. So this is sufficient ground."

Later, White House spokesman Josh Earnest said that Turkey had submitted materials related to Gulen and the administration was reviewing whether they amounted to a formal extradition request. Earnest added that a decision on whether to extradite would be made under a long-standing treaty between the two countries, and wouldn't be made by Obama.

Gulen has strongly denied the government's charges, suggesting that Friday's attempted coup could have been staged as a pretext for the Erdogan government to seize even more power. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CRACKDOWNS

Tuesday's dismissals touched every aspect of government life.

- The latest purges were intended to blunt the influence of Gulen, an Erdogan rival who has been in self-imposed exile in Pennsylvania since the late 1990s and whom the government has long accused of being behind a "parallel terrorist organization."
- The government announced the firing of nearly 24,000 teachers and Interior Ministry employees and demanded the resignations of another 1,577 university deans.

GERMANY

Train attacker vowed 'revenge' on 'infidels'

A 17-year-old Afghan asylum-seeker vowing "revenge on these infidels" went on an axe-and-knife rampage on a train in southern Germany, wounding five people before being shot and killed by police — an attack that German authorities conceded Tuesday was almost impossible to prevent.

German officials didn't identify the attacker or the victims, but Hong Kong's immigration department said among those wounded were four members of a family of five from the southern Chinese city.

At least one member of the Chinese family and another woman attacked outside the train were in life-threatening condition, according to Bamberg prosecutor Erik Ohlenschlager.

Daesh claimed responsibility for the Monday night train attack, which came less than a week after the Bastille Day truck attack in Nice, France, also claimed by Daesh, in which 84 people were killed.

Bavaria's top security official Joachim Herrmann said, while the Nice attack was "clearly another dimension," in both cases the choices of weapons and targets made them "extremely difficult to prevent in any fashion." THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Trump nominated amid plagiarism controversy

U.S. ELECTION

Campaign insists no evidence of misconduct

The plagiarism accusations centre on Monday night's well-received speech by Republican nominee Donald Trump's wife, Melania Trump. Two passages — each 30 words or longer — matched a 2008 Democratic convention address by Michelle Obama nearly word-for-word.

Trump's campaign managed only to keep the controversy alive on Day 2 of the convention by insisting there was no evidence of plagiarism, while offering no explanation for how the strikingly similar passages wound up in Mrs. Trump's address. The matter consumed news coverage from Cleveland, obscuring Mrs. Trump's broader effort to show her husband's softer side.

Democrat Hillary Clinton pounced on the tumult, saying the Republican gathering had so far been "surreal," comparing it to the classic fantasy film Wizard of Oz.

"When you pull back the curtain, it was just Donald Trump with nothing to offer to the American people," Clinton said.

Top Trump adviser Paul Manafort said the matter had been "totally blown out of proportion."

"They're not even sentences. They're literally phrases. I was impressed somebody did their homework to think that that could be possibly done," Manafort said.

In the midst of the plagiarism allegations, Republicans officially nominated Trump as their presidential standard-bearer, capping the billionaire businessman's stunning takeover of the GOP and propelling him into a November faceoff with Democrat Hillary Clinton. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Oh noro, not now

Health officials Tuesday said 11 members of the planning team for the California delegation to the Republican convention were recovering from a bout of norovirus, or what's known as stomach flu. No delegates appeared to be affected. The symptoms, which can include vomiting and diarrhea, were first reported Thursday as logistics members arrived at a hotel about an hour west of Cleveland, said Pete Schade, Erie County health commissioner. Those who got sick are isolated in their rooms, Schade said, and the Ohio Health Department is trying to identify the source.

DAY 2

He carries a gun to protest 'fascist policies'

Micah Naziri
STEVEN GOETZ/FOR METRO

All day Tuesday, media swarmed around Micah Naziri, who openly carried an AR-15 assault rifle through the streets.

Naziri said he came to town from his home in Yellow Springs, Ohio, "to protest and oppose Donald Trump's proposed fascist policies."

"The message I want to send is that if anyone attempts to unconstitutionally and illegally create a fascist police state in the United States, they will be resisted," Naziri said.

While Naziri answered Metro's question, another man badgered him over his head covering, asking if he was a Muslim. Naziri smiled and calmly refused to answer, insisting it was a distraction from the purpose of his protest.

He compared Trump's campaign to Adolf Hitler's in 1932: "His rhetoric was very much like Trump's and in the beginning no one took him seriously.

"There are such large numbers of Trump supporters saying awful things about depriving large groups of people of their constitutional and human rights," he said. "This is something that should be bothering anyone who believes in freedom."

Grocery free agents on the rise in Canada

SHOPPING

Convenience, desire for exclusive items behind trend

It's one of Vancouver's worst-kept secrets.

Since 2012, diehard fans of U.S. grocery chain Trader Joe's have been able to get their hands on Speculoos Cookie Butter and Triple Ginger Snaps at a tiny storefront in the city's Kitsilano neighbourhood.

The cheekily named Pirate Joe's, which first opened under the guise of a traditional Romanian bakery, has shelves and shelves of more than 1,000 Trader Joe's products and was the brainchild of owner and founder Mike Hallatt.

After being closed for four months, the store is set to reopen this week at a bigger location.

Hallatt says customers gravitate towards his business because of brand loyalty and a frustration with the choices and prices at his big-box grocery competitors.

Pirate Joe's isn't the only small grocery delivery service in the country.

In November, a husband and wife team started Comfort.to to bring Costco orders to those living in downtown Toronto who don't have a store membership, want to avoid the shopping crowds or lack the time or access to a vehicle to get to the chain's suburban stores.

Since its launch, Comfort.to has had more than 1,200 orders — sometimes up to 25 deliveries per weekend. Each customer is charged a flat fee of $10 for a delivery.

The appeal of the service, says 29-year-old founder Vitaliy Savitsky, is that customers, especially those living downtown, want better value on their grocery bills.

Ron Damiani, a spokesman for Costco Canada, says the retailer is a wholesaler and therefore doesn't take issue with Comfort.to reselling its products to people who may not have memberships.

STATISTICS CANADA STUDY

Laid-off Canadians go back to school

A new Statistics Canada study says there are significant correlations between job layoffs and full-time enrolment in post-secondary education.

The research found 3.1 per cent of men who lost their jobs at the start of the recession in 2008 went back to school. In contrast, only 0.6 per cent of men who didn't lose their jobs enrolled in full-time schooling.

Among women, 3.1 per cent of them enrolled full time in a post-secondary institution, compared with one per cent of women who didn't lose their jobs between 2001 and 2011.

The goal of the paper was to take a closer look at how people respond after losing their job, or even when they anticipate a possible layoff.

ROSEMARY WESTWOOD ON MELANIA'S PERFORMANCE

Spousal speeches are intended to humanize candidates. But Donald Trump is committed to a singular, flat caricature. Depth is the antithesis. Humanizing him is the exact opposite of the goal.

It was either 24 hours of a hot Melania mess, or one more checked box for the Trump campaign.

Either Melania Trump has been humiliated after her Republican convention speech echoed, at times word for word, sections of Michelle Obama's historic 2008 endorsement of her husband, or her speech had more in common with My Little Pony (according to a Republican party strategist) and, anyway, she "hit it out of the park," according to Trump's chief campaign strategist, who may or may not have been responsible for the speech.

Plagiarism allegations aside, Melania Trump offered a relatively flawless execution. Pundits and news outlets politely did not mention the occasional misuse of English. Many seemed careful — if not keen — to help Melania save face for mispronunciations she can't help, while giving a speech she was loath to make.

Nothing's gained from pointing out a few misplaced S's, they calculated. But then again, many pundits suggested nearly nothing at all was gained from the speech. It floated along with empty phrases ("he loves this country so much"), instead of feeding the expectation that we might learn anything interesting or intimate at all about Melania or her husband.

Spousal speeches are intended to humanize candidates, like an exclusive interview with People magazine (You might be surprised to hear it, but Mr. Hotstuff simply hates kale!), and pundits weren't feeling they got enough tidbits about Trump's morning bed hair or that one special moment when the facade fell down and he seemed vulnerably human.

But that should not surprise us. As we learned again this week from Trump's The Art of the Deal ghostwriter, Tony Schwartz, Trump adores the strongman image. He's obsessed with the attention, and the myth. He's committed to a singular, flat caricature. Depth is the antithesis. Humanizing him is the exact opposite of the goal.

ACCORDING TO PLAN Melania Trump waves after addressing delegates as her husband, Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, applauds during the Republican National Convention on Monday. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

It's also doubtful that "Men for Trump" (an actual campaign button sported at the convention) need to see a human, anyways. The demonstrably false image of an omniscient, unimpeachable, and alpha male demagogue seems to be selling just fine.

But women are viewed differently. They are seen to need some kind of soft touch, and given Trump's abysmal polling among that half of Americans, Melania was also expected to help bring the ladies on board. This goal makes further sense given the "Women for Trump" event Monday, in which speakers were forced to ask themselves questions because the turnout was so low.

It may have worked. As reported by Julia Ioffe in Politico magazine, Republican women ate Melania right up. They loved the dress, they loved her "elegance." They hate Michelle Obama — insight that was offered without prompting from Ioffe — and were glad to think that, under Melania, "the White House will go back to what it used to be." Besides being beautiful, one cooed, "she's submissive to her husband." Their comments about an outspoken, inelegant Michelle were more subtle examples of the racism and xenophobia on display through the convention's first day, a hum of joyous anger where delegates treated various speakers' anti-immigrant and anti-Islam messages like scripture.

But the darkest atmosphere descended upon mention of one name: Hillary Clinton. It was a viscous sound. Deep and rumbling. Even across the airwaves into a Canadian apartment, it gave me chills. Imagine being hated that much, I thought. The crowd sounded bloodthirsty, as if, were Clinton to actually arrive, all hell literally could break loose. At its height, a mother of an American government staffer killed in the Benghazi attack whipped up calls for Clinton's imprisonment. And when the plagiarism accusations took over the news cycle Tuesday, it was Clinton who many blamed for seeding the story.

That, of course, is silly. But no Trump fan would mind. What the Melania-speech scandal shows is exactly what we should have learned by now: The narrative, not the truth, is what drives Donald Trump's presidency bid. A sexy, subservient and substanceless Melania suits the 1950s-white-America nostalgia of Trump's campaign just fine.

Clinton is a perfect target for their teeth-gnashing both because she advocates for all the progressive changes wrought since then, and also because she's strong-armed her way out of that traditional wifely role. The sexism that haunted her 2008 bid has gone nowhere. It's actually quite at home — even amplified — in Cleveland. There, hating her for Benghazi hit ludicrous heights, because she's doubly hated as a woman who's defied her traditional role.

This convention has already been dubbed a "horror show" of D-list celebrity speeches, failed insurrections and plagiarism. But that's by people who it was never meant to entertain.

The true unknown in this election is the size of the nominee's target market: those who are susceptible to Trump's messaging, to his persona, to his empty promises. This whole week will be about them.

And that's what makes it all so frighteningly grave.

A sexy, subservient and substanceless Melania suits the 1950s-white-America nostalgia of Trump's campaign just fine.

Bring home Canadian man trapped in Egypt

John Greyson | Mohamed Fahmy | Tarek Loubani

All three of us have spent substantial time in Egypt's most notorious prisons among thousands of people arbitrarily detained — activists, journalists and regular citizens, Egyptian and non-Egyptian. Tireless advocacy and political lobbying finally helped bring us home, but we left behind those who weren't as lucky.

One of those prisoners is Canadian permanent resident Khaled Al-Qazzaz, a philanthropist, educator, husband and father, whose wife and four children are all Canadian citizens, and who now faces life-threatening injuries as a result of his imprisonment. We believe that the Liberal government under Prime Minister Justin Trudeau can bring him and his family home.

Like many people who are arbitrarily detained, Khaled was not charged with a crime. He was arrested in 2013 and spent hundreds of days in solitary confinement. He was kept in the adjacent cell to Mohamed Fahmy, a journalist with Al Jazeera at the time. As Khaled will surely tell you, it's the sheer physical loneliness that's toughest to deal with, the feeling of being cut off from family and friends. He and Mohamed tried their best to console each other as they dealt with this feeling.

An international campaign, spearheaded by his wife, Sarah, and amplified by thousands of supporters, finally managed to force the Egyptians to release Khaled in late 2014. Khaled's children, excited to see their father after years apart, travelled with their mother to Egypt. The first priority: to get Khaled to a Canadian hospital, where he could finally be treated for a life-threatening spinal ailment acquired in prison.

The family finally got to the Cairo airport, hoping to fly to Canada together, only to be told by Egyptian officials that Khaled is on the country's no-fly list. Sarah and her kids can leave, but Khaled has to stay. Devastated, they all chose to remain in Cairo. The Egyptian authorities confiscated the money Sarah saved for her husband's spinal treatment, and even froze the family's business assets in Egypt, leaving them financially crippled.

We ask that Prime Minster Trudeau put himself in Khaled's position. What would he do? Would he choose to keep his family close and live under constant threat or would he choose to send his family back home and be cut off from them yet again?

The prime minister can end this nightmare by making a call to President Abdel Fattah el-Sissi. Yet the prime minister has delegated his responsibility to his junior ministers. Why? Releasing us did not hurt Canada-Egypt relations. Releasing Khaled won't either.

Trudeau has not brought Khaled home, though he has announced $30 million in grants to Egypt with millions more to come.

Khaled and his family can get home if our prime minister makes the call.

John Greyson is an associate professor at York University

Mohamed Fahmy is a Canadian-Egyptian journalist

Tarek Loubani is a physician

All three were held in Egyptian jails without just cause.

Syrian women cook menu of friendship and self-sufficiency

Genna Buck
Metro Canada

Walk into the Depanneur, a restaurant and gathering-place in Toronto, on any Thursday, and you'll be hit with savoury and distinctly Syrian smells like kibbeh (bulgur balls with spiced lamb), Khyar belaban (cucumber-mint dip), or Torab el Melook (a trifle-like concoction of pineapple, custard and crumbled cookies).

You'll also see around 10 Syrian women — from 20-somethings with babes in arms to grandmothers — busily making and packaging gourmet meals.

They're part of a project called the Newcomer Kitchen. It got its modest start in April after Len Senater, The Depanneur's owner, learned government-sponsored Syrian refugees were cooped up in crowded hotels.

He invited a small group of mothers with "incredible culinary talent" to cook traditional, multi-course Syrian meals in his expansive commercial kitchen, which sits empty most of the day.

They'd take the food back to their families, and any extra could be sold to cover costs and provide the women with a little extra income.

It turned into something much bigger.

Now that refugees are out of hotels, the Newcomer Kitchen has evolved into a brisk meal-delivery business involving about 40 newcomer women in all.

The meals go on sale online for $20 every Tuesday morning. The women spend all day Thursday cooking, and the food's ready for pickup or delivery in time for dinner. Any profits left after grocery costs and a small overhead are split among the cooks. Last week, they took home $120 each — about $18 an hour.

Since pictures of the very first gathering went viral, demand for the fresh, authentic Syrian meals has far outstripped supply. The program has earned an endorsement from famed Syrian chef and author Anissa Helou. Participants have started catering top-tier events, pop-up style, including a Canada Day iftar (Ramadan meal), attended by Toronto Mayor John Tory.

"It's incredible to see the women laughing and talking and singing," Senater said, "interacting in a way they might not have had a chance to do in quite some time."

Senater and Cara Benjamin-Pace, the Depanneur's manager, are planning the next steps: incorporate as a non-profit, hire staff, and create a guide for restaurants across Canada and beyond to copy their success. With those goals in mind, they've raised almost $26,000 so far on the crowd-funding site FundRazr.

That's good news for husband-and-wife team Esmaeel Abou Fakher and Rahaf Alakbani, refugees who were instrumental in getting the Newcomer Kitchen off the ground. A few months ago, they were stuck in a Travelodge. Now they're newcomer liaisons.

Alakbani, who's bilingual, is a go-between, helping recruit refugee women and make sure they're confident in their roles.

"They trust me and my husband," Alakbani said in a May interview. "I asked, 'Do you miss cooking?' and they said 'Of course!'"

The chance to talk and share a meal together was just the start of the bounty of benefits.

Fakher emphasized how important it is for newcomers to earn income and feel independent in an unfamiliar place. "It's not easy, rent is expensive," he said, "The life here is also hard, (but) not like our country."

> Healing and reconciliation are happening in our kitchen.
> Cara Benjamin-Pace

Thanks to mentorship from volunteers, the women are practicing English and becoming pros at using public transit. Several have earned a food handling certificate in Arabic. Local restaurants have come knocking, looking to poach them for other jobs.

"I'm really interested in how to empower women who otherwise have not really had fair access to wealth and opportunity," Benjamin-Pace said. "They're changing before our eyes."

Participants are Christian, Druze and Muslim. In Syria, they might have been divided by a bitter conflict. But food has a way of bringing people together.

"Healing and reconciliation are happening in our kitchen," Benjamin-Pace said. The results are delicious: "Even Len and I, who are around good food everyday, are sometimes overwhelmed at how good the food is."

RECIPE

A savoury Syrian appetizer: Anissa Helou's kibbeh balls

Kibbeh Balls
Makes 20 balls

Stuffing
- 90 g (3 oz) unsalted butter
- 60 g (2 oz) pine nuts
- 500 g (1 lb) large onions, finely chopped
- 200 g (7 oz) lean minced lamb
- 10 ml (2 tsp) ground cinnamon
- 10 ml (2 tsp) ground allspice
- 2 ml (1/2 tsp) finely ground black pepper
- Salt, to taste

Kibbeh
- 1 medium onion, peeled and quartered
- 500 g (1 lb) finely minced lean lamb from the leg
- 200 g (7 oz) fine bulgur
- 10 ml (2 tsp) ground cinnamon
- 10 ml (2 tsp) ground allspice
- 2 ml (1/2 tsp) finely ground black pepper
- Salt, to taste
- Basil leaves, for garnish (optional)

Directions:

1. Melt butter in a deep frying pan over medium heat and add pine nuts, stirring constantly, until golden brown. Set aside.

2. In the same butter, fry chopped onions until soft and transparent. Add minced meat and cook, until it loses all traces of pink. Remove from heat. Season with cinnamon, allspice, pepper and salt. Stir in pine nuts. Taste and adjust seasoning if necessary. Set aside.

3. In a food processor, finely chop quartered onion, then add meat and process until mixed well. Wash bulgur in two or three changes of cold water, drain well and add to meat. Pulse a few times. Transfer meat mixture to a bowl.

4. Prepare a bowl of lightly salted water and have it at hand. Add cinnamon, allspice, pepper and salt and mix with your hand, dipping your hand every now and then in salted water to moisten it and the kibbeh, until spices are well incorporated. Knead meat mixture for about 3 minutes until you have a smooth paste.

5. Divide kibbeh into 20 balls, each the size of a large plum. Lightly moisten hands in salted water and place one meatball in the cup of one hand. With the index finger of your other hand burrow a hole into the meatball while rotating it. This makes the hollowing out easier and more even. You should produce a thin meat shell resembling a topless egg. Be careful not to pierce bottom or sides of meat.

6. Put 1 1/2 to 2 tsp of stuffing inside meat shell, gently pushing stuffing in with your finger, and pinch open edges together with your fingers. Cup your free fingers over the filled ball and gently shape it into a ball. Put finished ball on a non-stick baking sheet. Continue making balls until you have finished both meat and stuffing. If you have some stuffing left, serve it warm on the side or fry some eggs on it.

7. Preheat oven to 350 F. Brush kibbeh balls with melted butter. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes or until crisp and lightly golden. Serve hot, warm or at room temperature. Garnish plate with basil leaves, if desired.

Women who are 'lager' than life

GENDER ISSUES

Females fighting for place on craft brewing scene

There's no doubt about it — the craft beer industry is booming. The number of licensed breweries in Canada has grown 70 per cent over the past five years. Craft beer sales in Ontario have more than doubled in the same timeframe. In B.C., sales have tripled.

However, even with the boom, there are few women working in the industry, particularly as brewers and in positions of leadership.

And, no, it's not because men drink all of the beer. Women account for 30 to 40 per cent of craft beer consumption. Plus, historically, beer was almost solely produced and sold by women. It wasn't until the Industrial Revolution, when financial opportunities were realized, that the industry shifted.

During a recent craft brewers' panel discussion, Ellen Bounsall, one of the founders of McAuslan Brewing in Montreal said only two women in Canada were involved in brewing when the craft beer industry started in the '80s.

And while there are no hard statistics about the number of women working in the industry in Canada today, it does appear to be slowly on the rise.

Erin Kloos, brewer at Grand River Brewing in Cambridge, Ont. says like in many professions, women have to work harder to break into the craft brewing industry. KATHERINE WISSENZ

CBC recently reported three female head brewers in B.C., of 120 craft breweries. Niagara College offers a brewing program where eight to 22 per cent of the students are female each year. So, while there are no longer just two female brewers in Canada, the industry is still male dominated.

"I think you have to acknowledge that there are disparities between men and women in the brewing world," says Erin Kloos, brewer at Grand River Brewing in Cambridge. "You see it everywhere in society, women have had to work harder to break into sports, politics, business and essentially every other field, so what would make the beer industry any different?"

Being a woman working in a "man's world" has its share of challenges. Kloos says she's gone to brew planning meetings where the immediate opinions are "to go light, fruity, figure-fitting and spritzy" when creating something for female consumers.

"Most of the beer-drinking women I know, love and appreciate the darkest, hoppiest, booziest stuff we've got," she says.

However, the problems don't stop there. Female brewers have shared stories on everything from inappropriate jokes and sexual propositions to not receiving the same respect and acknowledgement in the workplace as their male counterparts.

Garnet Siddall, president of Side Launch Brewing in Collingwood and vice chair of Ontario Craft Brewers acknowledges there has been limited progress made so far. "The women that have joined have done so because they love the industry despite the issues in it," she says. "Any progress has come because of the individuals who have forged their way bravely into the mix. And they haven't always had a warm welcome."

Ken Beattie, executive director of the B.C. Craft Brewers Guild, which is run by an entire male board, declined to comment, but offered several names of B.C. female brewers.

However, the women working in the craft beer industry have recognized the need to support their peers and have created various groups and events to do so, such as International Women's Collaboration Brew Day, Barley's Angels and the Society of Beer Drinking Ladies.

The association of Ontario Craft Brewers is also developing a strategy to support women in the industry. "We need to address the issue, admit there is one and collect some basic data. We need a baseline from which to measure our progress," says Siddall.

"Then we need to figure out what the specific problems are. Marketing? Hiring? Education? Work environments? What exactly is it that is preventing women from entering the field that they created? Once that basic legwork is done then we can begin to address them.

"Very basic stuff, but we have to start somewhere."

RECIPE

Keep your cool this summer with quick-cooking vermicelli

Your city keeps issuing heat alerts. You want something that won't heat up your tiny kitchen — filling, but light enough that it won't make you sleepier than the heat does.

This quick vermicelli dish is for you.

These thin noodles made from rice are a staple at Asian grocers, but large supermarkets stock them to appeal to the Asian population (as well as the gluten-free crowd).

The noodles come in different shapes, from the broad, flat noodle used in pho to the thin, hairlike strands used in stir frys. It's the latter that you want for this recipe.

These thin noodles take just a minute or two to cook when submerged in hot water, meaning minimal cooking time.

When tender, rinse the noodles under cold running water to stop the cooking process and turn them into a cold dish. Toss noodles in whatever vegetables you have, firm tofu cubes (seared or cold), fresh mint leaves to give it a cool herbal note, and a splash of sweet chili sauce for flavour.

Match the delicate texture of the rice noodles by shredding or slicing vegetables very thinly and by dicing the tofu into small cubes.

This way, every bite with have equal parts noodle, vegetable and protein rather than a big hunk of carrot with a few strands of vermicelli hanging off it.

Cold vermicelli with tofu and vegetables

Serves 1

Make this on a hot evening after a long day at work, or scale up the recipe and a colourful array of vegetables, proteins and herbs for a beautiful and tasty group meal.

Ingredients:

- 1 handful dried thin rice noodles (vermicelli)
- 1 tsp (5 mL) olive oil
- 1 cup (250 mL) bite-sized firm tofu cubes
- Salt and pepper, to taste
- 1/2 cup (125 mL) chopped green beans
- Sweet chili sauce, to taste
- 1/4 cup (60 mL) grated carrot
- 5 to 6 cherry or grape tomatoes, halved
- 1/2 avocado thinly sliced
- Fresh mint leaves, to garnish

You can toss this dinner together, no sweat. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Directions:

1. In a large heatproof bowl, submerge rice noodles in boiling water, swirling noodles until tender, about 1 minute. Drain and rinse under cold water, making sure strands don't stick together. Set aside.

2. In a medium skillet over medium-high heat, heat oil. Sauté tofu cubes and green beans until both start turning golden brown.

3. In a serving bowl, toss tofu and beans with noodles, chili sauce, carrot and tomatoes. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Top with avocado and mint. Serve immediately.

Alternative herbs: If fresh mint isn't available, try basil and cilantro as they match the Thai flavours of the sweet chili sauce. Just make sure to chop the herbs finely if the leaves are really big.

More topping ideas: Treat the noodles as a base and the rest is up to you. Opt for crunchy vegetables to contrast the texture of the soft noodles: grated raw beet, zucchini ribbons, chopped green onion, diced peppers. Peanuts and cashews also add crunch and a nuttiness that complements the sauce.

'LITTLE WORMS'

Vermicelli a global hit

Many in West Indian, South Asian and Middle Eastern nations had bowls of the stuff browned in butter and cooked in milk for a sweet Eid dessert. America has Rice-A-Roni. South of the border, Mexicans eat fideos (vermicelli in a chili, tomato and garlic sauce). Italians toss the noodles with tomatoes and grated Parmesan. The word vermicelli means "little worms" in Italian. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

The hot heat of summer doesn't deter us from getting our caffeine fix. While blended iced beverages are tasty and filling, we shouldn't be drinking our calories. If you're craving a cool coffee drink, stick to the original, not the fancy flavoured drinks. Between the whipped cream and the vanilla and chai flavour base, you're adding creamy calories, fat and loads of sugar. A regular iced coffee, made with 18% cream, has over three times less calories, fat and sugar. To make it even less of an indulgence, get it made with milk and ask for half the sugar.

Celery — the veg that gets no credit

When Master Chef judge Graham Elliot was asked to name the most underused vegetable, his reply was immediate: Celery!

"I love it for the crunch, and for its slight bitter edge," says the celebrated Chicago chef and restaurateur.

"You can juice it, shave it into salads, pickle it, garnish a cocktail, make stock … there are so many things you can do with celery," says Elliot, "and it's inexpensive."

Fellow cookbook author Barbara Kafka agrees, calling celery "massively ignored except in chicken soup or tuna salad."

She could have added Ants on a Log, the popular kid's snack of celery sticks stuffed with peanut butter and dotted with raisins.

The sturdy green stalks weren't always so unloved. During Medieval times, wizards believed celery seeds could help them fly. And celery leaves, which most of us discard, were woven into garlands found in the tomb of Egyptian pharaoh Tutankhamen.

We can probably thank the French for forcing us to buy a bunch of celery every time we make a soup or stew. In a mirepoix (soffritto in Italian), chopped celery is sautéed gently with onions and carrots for a flavourful base. The leaves are also bundled into a bouquet garni with bay leaves, parsley and thyme sprigs to flavour stock.

Now that meals have morphed into an all-day graze, celery is a superstar. Its portability and refreshing crunch — it's actually 95 per cent water — makes it an ideal snack. As Elliot says, crunch away! TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Inception a wine for all

While every wine label tells a story some are way more War and Peace than they are a haiku. Take the 2012 Inception Deep Layers Red ($13.95-$14.99) for example. You'd think being made in the beautiful Stellenbosch region of South Africa from an inspired blend of Shiraz, Petit Verdot and Mourvèdre would be enough of a tale to encourage you to pick up a bottle.

Though it has nothing to do with the wine's creation or taste; Distell, its creator, has built a whole narrative around its name through its front panel. Resembling an artsy tattoo, Inception's label is a graphic cornucopia starring Adam and Eve surrounded by tree branches loaded with hidden images.

Aimed squarely at millennials, it proved a hit with the more mature crowd I hang with at a recent barbecue.

JOHANNA SCHNELLER WHAT I'M WATCHING

With Trump, it's now too serious for jokes

THE SHOW: Late Show with Stephen Colbert, July 18, 2016 (CBS)
THE MOMENT: Jon Stewart's cameo

Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert polish off their old personas this week on the Late Show, but it doesn't hold up. CONTRIBUTED

Host Stephen Colbert knocks on the door of a remote cabin. A bearded Jon Stewart answers. "You will not believe who the Republican nominee is," Colbert says, as Stewart takes a sip of tea. "Trump."

Stewart's spit take hits Colbert's face. "The guy who filed for bankruptcy in '91?" He asks. "And '92, and 2004, and 2009? That guy?"

"Same guy," Colbert says. "The guy who looks like an angry creamsicle."

"Decomposing Jack O'Lantern," Stewart says.

Colbert nods. "The guy who said, and I quote, 'I have black guys counting my money. I hate it. The only guys I want counting my money are short guys that wear yamulkes all day.' So you can see why I'm here."

Stewart fetches Colbert's former persona from The Colbert Report. He does his own spit take at the word "Trump." After a commercial, Former Stephen enters the CBS studio on a gold chariot borne by buff, shirtless Uncle Sam's, and riffs on the word "Trumpiness."

It should be comforting to see Stewart and Colbert back in form. Instead, it made me feel slightly ill. Because day one of the U.S. Republican convention was a sickening affair, beginning with racial insults and ending with Melania Trump's plagiarized speech.

Stewart and Colbert's old personas don't hold up, because it feels too late for jokes now. The divide between the issues of the world and Trump's inadequacy to handle them is too serious.

Bill Maher takes aim at conventions

POLITICS

Host adds new slots this week and next for U.S. nominations

When did Bill Maher hatch the idea for special Real Time broadcasts during the political conventions?

"Maybe when Donald Trump began talking about riots," Maher replies with a puckish grin.

That was way back in March, when the now-presumptive GOP presidential nominee warned of riots at the convention if any efforts arose to snatch the nomination from him.

Such a thing now seems unlikely, but this week's Republican convention in Cleveland, followed by next week's Democratic shindig in Philadelphia, still promise to be "crazier and more outrageous and more interesting than ever," says Maher, almost smacking his lips.

No wonder he's supplementing his weekly Real Time hour (Fridays at 10 p.m. EDT on HBO) with half-hour pop-ups tonight and tomorrow as well as July 27 and 28 for a rapid response to each night's goings-on.

Also available to non-HBO subscribers by live-streaming on the Real Time YouTube channel, each edition will include a monologue as well as Maher's signature New Rules commentary and, in between, discourse led by Maher with his in-studio guests (Tonight it will include documentary filmmaker Michael Moore, political correspondent Joy Reid and advice columnist Dan Savage; on Thursday, economic equality advocate Heather McGhee, California Lt. Gov. Gavin Newsom and economist Robert Reich).

Each program is scheduled to air live at 11 p.m. EDT — that is, unless significant stuff is still happening: "You can't interrupt a riot," Maher cracks.

He isn't the only observer who will cast a special comic eye on the proceedings.

• Comedy Central's Trevor Noah is originating The Daily Show from Cleveland's Breen Center for the Performing Arts this week at 11 p.m. EDT and next week from the University of Pennsylvania.

• CBS' The Late Show with Stephen Colbert (11:35 p.m. EDT) will broadcast live from its New York studio with teams on-site at each convention delivering reports. (Each week of live shows will be specially themed: The 2016 Trumpublican Donational Conventrump and The 2016 Democratic National Convincing.)

• TBS' Full Frontal with Samantha Bee" (Mondays at 10:30 p.m. EDT) presents a road-to-Cleveland special interviewing regular Americans along the way. It airs tonight at 10:30 p.m. EDT, with hopes for another special pegged to the Democrats' convention. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Already handsome sedan ups its game

Dan Ilika
AutoGuide.com

Some people will tell you midsize sedans don't sell anymore; that they're a dying breed pushed aside by the popularity of the crossover.

Those people are what I like to call "wrong." Sure, crossovers are a big deal these days, but midsize sedans are nothing to scoff at either, with close to three million sold in North America each year.

Which brings us to the 2016 Mazda6. It's not the newest midsize sedan on the market, but it may still hold the title as the best looking — and one of the best in the business.

It's rare that a design language translates so well to so many different forms, but Mazda has accomplished that with its current lineup. Park the 6 alongside any other model in Mazda's stable and the family ties are immediately evident. The few character lines the sedan does have tie in nicely with its muscular shoulders.

Little has been done to the exterior of Mazda's flagship sedan for 2016, save for a revised grille design, while cars in GT trim, like our tester, add LED headlights, fog lights and grille illumination, but the changes only add to the esthetic appeal of an already handsome sedan.

Of all the cars in the midsize segment, the Mazda6's interior, at least in GT trim, comes closest to encroaching on premium car territory. And it's inside where the most work has been done for this model year, with a host of changes made to improve the cabin's feel and function.

Mazda's Heads-Up Cockpit concept is executed to perfection here, with a driver-focused interior that puts all the controls well within view and reach. The in-dash infotainment screen has been replaced with a freestanding unit a la Audi and Mercedes-Benz, lowering the height of the dash, while the move to an electronic parking brake, a first for Mazda, cuts down on console clutter and makes room for what matters. And what matters is the new infotainment control knob, which proves easy to use while driving, though its functionality is wisely — though at times frustratingly — limited while the vehicle is in motion.

To describe the Mazda6's drive as engaging tells only part of the story. The chassis is nice and stiff and the suspension borders on sporty, but it's pliable enough to make for a comfortable ride.

The only engine available is a 2.5-litre four-cylinder, which is a bit disappointing considering what the 6 could be with a larger engine — and considering the class-leading Honda Accord is available with a V6 available under the hood.

Overall though, the Mazda6 Grand Touring hits all the marks that are sure to keep this segment rolling along for years to come.

'Spaghetti Car' as ridiculous as it sounds

BMW and longtime partner Toilet Paper have created the BMW i3 "Spaghetti Car." The German automaker was quick to clarify that the BMW i3 Spaghetti Car isn't an official BMW Art Car, and will be destroyed sometime after the Rencontres d'Arles Festival of Photography that runs until Sept. 25. Toilet Paper is a bi-annual avant-garde picture-based publication and brand created by artist Maurizio Cattelan, and together with Pierpaolo Ferrari, the BMW i3 Spaghetti Car was born. Cattelan himself has instructed the car to be destroyed after the event and has actually officially retired from "art" since 2011. JASON SIU/AUTOGUIDE.COM

Jaguar XF goes tornado chasing

Jaguar has teamed up with a U.S.-based tornado chaser, sending him into the thick of things with a new Jaguar XF. "Tornado Tim" Baker was given an XF for a late-season chase that led him on a 3,220-kilometre long expedition across seven different states until he eventually caught up with a category EF 0 (97 to 113 km/h winds) tornado, about two hours outside of Chicago. "It took us a while to track one down, but when the weather map delivered, the car did too," said Baker. "The navigation and in-car Wi-Fi, which allowed us to connect our multiple devices, worked brilliantly in the chase. The all-wheel-drive capability was also excellent as we travelled through rain and floods on loose gravel roads," he said.

Swedish supercar superstars show appreciation

Stephen Elmer
AutoGuide.com

Koenigsegg builds some of the fastest and most meticulously constructed cars on the planet, but what do they drive home after a long day at work?

Koenigsegg staff recently gathered for a family day where they were invited to bring their loved ones and prized vehicles to show off. As you may expect, it is clear that a lot of workers at the Swedish supercar company are passionate about automobiles based on what they choose to drive. And no, they're not all Saabs!

A love for American muscle is clearly shared among the Swedish workers, who brought a 1969 Camaro SS, a last-generation Mustang, a Ram 1500 and even an older Mercury. More than a few of the cars are custom tuned as well, with one employee sporting a Nissan 200SX with more than one horsepower per kilogram.

CUSTOM CAR
Easily one of the best custom upgrades seen was a kid's toy turned car carpet, installed in a nice-looking Opel Kadett.

And if you're wondering what CEO Christian Von Koenigsegg drives, he's on record gushing about his Tesla Model S and how he thinks it's better than the BMW M5.

IN BRIEF

Ariel Atom eyes hybrid powertrain from Acura NSX

The head of Ariel, Simon Saunders, recently spoke about next-generation Atom models and how the British automaker plans to keep up with changing times. Saunders confirmed in the past that Ariel had investigated the possibility of using hybrid powertrains from Honda, but discovered that none were powerful enough, until now.

With the introduction of the NSX and its new hybrid setup, Ariel sees possibilities for its small track terror.

Saunders also believes that the powertrain will become more affordable once Honda adopts the technology throughout its range of vehicles.

"The technology in the NSX is cutting-edge and expensive, but it will work its way down the food chain to the hot hatches," he said. "At that point, it becomes achievable for us to use in the Atom."

Workers may get robot glove

TECHNOLOGY

GM licenses RoboGlove tech to medical company

Stephen Elmer
AutoGuide.com

General Motors wants to be the first company to test a new robotic glove that should help factory workers assemble cars.

GM has licensed its RoboGlove technology to a Swedish medical technology company called Bioservo Technologies, which will result in a new robotic glove that could help GM's factory workers build cars by reducing grip fatigue. The original RoboGlove, which was developed by GM and NASA, took nine years to create and was sent into space in 2011 on a humanoid robot called Robonaut 2.

GM already briefly tested the RoboGlove in one of its manufacturing facilities, but eventually stopped the program and began seeking a partner to help refine the glove as it couldn't fit multiple hand sizes and had a number of other undisclosed issues. Bioservo will now combine GM's RoboGlove technology with its own Soft Extra Muscle (SEM) glove to come up with a new grasp assist tool for industrial use.

"Combining the best of three worlds – space technology from NASA, engineering from GM and medtech from Bioservo – in a new industrial glove could lead to industrial scale use of the technology," said Tomas Ward, CEO of Bioservo Technologies.

GM intends to be the first U.S. manufacturing company to test the glove from Bioservo, to see if it helps in its assembly plants. The new glove will also be used for medical rehabilitation and helping to increase grip strength for those who need it.

VW, LG collaborate on connected car platform

Volkswagen has announced a partnership with LG Electronics to develop a next-generation connected car platform.

The two companies have signed a memorandum of understanding on joint research and development on Volkswagen's Cross-Over-Platform, aimed at enhancing vehicle connectivity and convenience. The connected car platform will take advantage of the latest in cloud technology to offer drivers seamless digital access to numerous features, some of which will focus on smart home and location-based services.

In the announcement, Volkswagen said the companies will focus on bringing together the connected car and the smart home so that vehicle owners can control and monitor smart devices in their homes.

5 STAR ATHLETES WHO COULD MISS OUT

Russia is facing a possible ban from next month's Olympics in Rio de Janeiro for its repeated doping scandals. If the ban is imposed, it would shake up the medal standings. Here are five Russian stars whose absences would be greatly felt:

1 Nataliya Ishchenko

With three Olympic and 19 world championship gold medals to her name, Ishchenko typifies Russia's total domination of synchronized swimming — it's won every Olympic event this century. If no Russians compete in Rio, China and Spain would fight for the two gold medals on offer.

2 Yelena Isinbayeva

The world record holder in the pole vault and a two-time Olympic gold medallist, Isinbayeva would compete at her fifth games in Rio, but she faces extra obstacles to get there. Russia's track and field team is already banned from the games due to widespread doping, and Isinbayeva's hopes rest on a successful appeal at the Court of Arbitration for Sport.

3 Aliya Mustafina

She led the Russian gymnastics team which narrowly failed to beat the U.S. to gold in the women's all-around in 2012 and also won individual gold in the uneven bars. While Mustafina has been plagued by injuries since, she bounced back with two European championship gold medals last month. Russia has arguably the world's richest tradition of excellence in gymnastics, and if its athletes aren't in Rio, the U.S. and China will benefit in the medal table.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

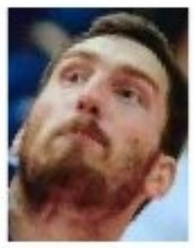
4 Yulia Efimova

One of the world's top breaststroke sprinters, Efimova spearheads the Russian swim team for Rio despite previous brushes with the anti-doping authorities. She bounced back from a drug ban to win 100-metre gold at last year's world championships in a fiercely competitive race with her longtime rival, Lithuanian teenager Ruta Meilutyte. Efimova missed four months this season after testing positive for meldonium.

5 Maxim Mikhaylov

Top scorer when Russia won the men's volleyball competition at London 2012, Mikhaylov would be a formidable opponent in Rio. Host nation Brazil had to settle for silver four years ago but is fired up for a gold medal in front of its home crowd.



GOLF

DeLaet hungry to bring medals home

There was a time when Graham DeLaet thought he would never be able to represent his country on the Olympic stage.

Now DeLaet will be part of a Canadian team brimming with potential when golf makes its Olympic return at the Rio de Janeiro Games following a 112-year absence.

The Canadian Olympic Committee and Golf Canada officially introduced the Olympic golf team Tuesday in Oakville, Ont. DeLaet will join a potent squad including 18-year-old phenom Brooke Henderson, David Hearn and Alena Sharp.

"Up until a few years ago I never really thought I'd ever have the chance to be an Olympian," said a smiling DeLaet. "Even just saying that and the closer and closer we get to Rio the more it's kind of sinking in. It's a pretty special opportunity, there's no question.

"Both David and I and Brooke and Alena, we want to bring back some hardware." THE CANADIAN PRESS

1904

Golf was played at the 1900 Paris Games and again in St. Louis in 1904. It was supposed to be an Olympic competition at the 1908 London Games, but when organizers couldn't agree on the format of play it was dropped from the slate of, not to reappear for over a century.

WWE

Ex-wrestlers file concussion lawsuit

More than 50 former professional wrestlers sued World Wrestling Entertainment Inc., saying the company is responsible for repeated head trauma including concussions they suffered in the ring that led to long-term neurological damage.

Jimmy "Superfly" Snuka, Joseph "Road Warrior Animal" Laurinaitis and Paul "Mr. Wonderful" Orndorff are among the plaintiffs who filed the lawsuit Monday in federal court in Connecticut. The lawsuit also names WWE chairman Vince McMahon as a defendant. Stamford-based WWE denies the allegations.

Last month, the 73-year-old Snuka was found mentally incompetent to stand trial in the 1983 death of his girlfriend near Allentown, Pa. His defence partly blames head trauma he suffered in the ring. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

+ CHOREOGRAPHY

Unlike other sports including football and hockey where players have suffered similar injuries, WWE matches involve specific moves scripted and choreographed by the WWE — thus making the company directly responsible for wrestlers' injuries, according to the lawsuit.

OLYMPICS

IOC reviews legal options on Russian ban

With just over two weeks until the opening ceremony, Russia still doesn't know whether its athletes — all or even some — will be competing in the Olympics in Rio de Janeiro. It may all come down to the lawyers.

While the IOC decided Tuesday to ban from the Rio Games all Russian Sports Ministry officials and other administrators implicated in allegations of a state-run doping program, it delayed a ruling on whether to take the unprecedented step of barring the entire Russian Olympic team.

The International Olympic Committee said it "will explore the legal options with regard to a collective ban of all Russian athletes for the Olympic Games 2016 versus the rights to individual justice."

The IOC has also said it could let individual international sports federations decide on whether to ban Russians from their events in Rio, just as the IAAF has done by ruling track and field athletes from the Games. The 28 international federations that govern the individual sports at the summer games have made clear that they do not support a blanket ban.

The IOC's legal options may become clearer after Thursday, when the highest court in sports will rule on an appeal by 68 Russian track and field athletes seeking to overturn their ban from the Games.

Two-time Olympic pole vault champion Yelena Isinbayeva was among those arguing the Russian track and field team's case Tuesday in Geneva at the Court of Arbitration for Sport. Should the court rule Thursday in their favour, it would seemingly rule out the chance of the IOC imposing a blanket ban.

If the court upholds the IAAF's exclusion of the track athletes, however, that would keep the possibility of a total ban in play. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Ortiz supplies plenty of ammo as BoSox take down Giants

David Ortiz hit a three-run homer and Rick Porcello remained unbeaten at home as the Boston Red Sox beat the struggling San Francisco Giants 4-0 on Tuesday night.

Brock Holt also homered for the Red Sox, who won for the seventh time in eight games despite a strong start by former teammate Jake Peavy.

San Francisco remained winless since the all-star break with its fourth straight loss. The Giants had just five hits and only three runners advanced beyond first base.

TUESDAY In Boston

RED SOX	GIANTS
4	0

Porcello (12-2) scattered four hits over 6-1/3 innings, striking out three and walking two while improving to 9-0 at home. Porcello settled down after allowing singles to the first two batters he faced.

Porcello ended up striking out the side in the first and the Giants had two hits over the next five innings. Porcello left after walking Jarrett Parker with one out in the seventh. Reliever Robbie Ross got a quick double play to end the threat.

Peavy (5-8), a key member of Boston's 2013 World Series champions, struck out six over six innings and held his former teammates to three hits, but two left the park. Holt's solo homer to centre in the third was Boston's first hit and the Red Sox tacked on three more runs when Peavy faced Ortiz in the fourth.

Dustin Pedroia led off with a walk and Xander Bogaerts followed with a single, setting up Ortiz's shot to right that cleared the bullpen and several rows of seats before finally landing.

RECIPE Salmon and Zucchini Skewers

Ceri Marsh & Laura Keogh
For Metro Canada

Rich, Asian flavours elevate this simple and healthy meal to something elegant enough to serve to guests.

Ready in
Prep time: 25 minutes
Total time: 35 minutes

Ingredients
- 1 tsp grated ginger
- 1/4 cup soy sauce
- 2 Tbsp rice wine vinegar
- 1 Tbsp sesame oil
- 3 filets of salmon
- 2 or 3 small zucchinis

Directions

1. Soak wooden skewers in water for at least 20 minutes.

2. Whisk together the ginger, soy, vinegar and sesame oil. Place salmon filets in the marinade for 20 minutes

3. Remove the salmon from the marinade and cut the filets into chunks — maybe 1 x 2 inches — and set aside. Slice the zucchini into rings and toss in the marinade quickly. Thread the fish and veggies onto the wooden skewers.

4. Preheat your grill or grill pan to medium high and wipe the grill with oil. Place the skewers over the heat and give each side about three minutes before turning. Serve these skewers over steamed rice or a bed of greens.

IT'S ALL IN THE STARS Your daily horoscope by Francis Drake

Aries March 21 - April 20
This is a good day to discuss the care and education of children. It's also a good day to lay the groundwork for social or sports events.

Taurus April 21 - May 21
You might see ways to make practical and beautiful improvements to where you live. What can you do to make your home run more efficiently and beautifully?

Gemini May 22 - June 21
Serious discussions with others will go well today. This is a good time to make plans for the future when talking to siblings, relatives and neighbors.

Cancer June 22 - July 23
If shopping today, you might find things that are both practical and beautiful. Meanwhile, this is an excellent day for business and commerce, because you see secure ways of making money.

Leo July 24 - Aug. 23
Today you are realistic about protecting what you own. If shopping for clothing you will buy practical, long-lasting and beautiful items.

Virgo Aug. 24 - Sept. 23
If you work alone or behind the scenes today, you will be amazed at your accomplishments. That's because you are goal-oriented and willing to do whatever it takes to get the job done.

Libra Sept. 24 - Oct. 23
Listen to good advice from someone older or more experienced. In particular, this applies to discussions about the arts, the entertainment world and the hospitality industry.

Scorpio Oct. 24 - Nov. 22
You will impress parents, bosses and people in authority with your ideas today. They see that you take your obligations seriously, and that you see many angles to things.

Sagittarius Nov. 23 - Dec. 21
It's easy to study today, because you want to learn something new. Furthermore, you will take your time to plow through something dry and tedious to get what you want.

Capricorn Dec. 22 - Jan. 20
This is an excellent day to smooth troubled waters about inheritances or disputes about shared property. Both parties will see ways to arrive at a mutually beneficial agreement.

Aquarius Jan. 21 - Feb. 19
Sit down with a close friend or partner and discuss the obligations of the relationship. You can solve problems today; people understand what is realistic.

Pisces
Feb. 20 - March 20
You can get a lot done at work today, because co-workers are cooperative. In addition, you will see practical ways to elegantly do things. Bravo!

Tangerine and UNITY Charity are partnering to bring you the hottest festival of the summer. Running from July 20 to July 23, the hip-hop inspired UNITY Festival will feature innovative artistic events that will attract local and internationally acclaimed artists. The festival culminates on July 23 with the free UNITY concert at Yonge-Dundas Square. This is just one of many ways that Tangerine's Bright Way Forward platform sets the stage to empower young Canadians to promote positive change in their communities.
